Documentary	Search for the Head of John the Baptist	Title 13 Part 4 Page 10	12:36	In 2010 small bone fragments were discovered in the ruins of the ancient monastery on Sveti Ivan, an island off Sozopol on Bulgaria's Southern Black Sea coast. In 2012, archaeologists provided scientific evidence to support the extraordinary claim that the remains could be from John the Baptist. The knuckle bone was carbon dated and found to be consistent with someone who lived in the early first century CE. Scientists from the University of Copenhagen analysed the DNA of the bones, finding they came from a single individual, probably a man, in the modern-day Middle East, where John would have lived. This is not a proof that the bone particles found in Bulgaria belonged to St. John the Baptist because there is no DNA database of early Christian saints, but the fact, that the scientific tests did not prove the relics are fakes, is unusual.

Compass	God is a Wandjina	Title 60 Part 4 Page 2	14:41	This extract presents a blend of ancient culture and Christian beliefs. After seventy years, a group of elders from Mowanjum returned to the now abandoned mission at Kunmunya in the Kimberley, Western Australia. The mission was established by the Presbyterian Church (now part of the Uniting Church) in 1915 to civilise, evangelise and protect Aboriginal people from the worst abuses of colonisation, from pastoralists, and pearling crews. Kunmunya was closed in 1951 to move the people closer to town and hospitals, but they had to leave behind their sacred sites.
